Blue eyes with soul are beaming; They'll look thee through and through; With light and love they're streaming, So mild and warm and true. And when my heart is sore distressed. And surrow fills my lonely breast, Let, then, blue eyes my sorrow win What joy—what blies I see therein!

Blue eyes from heaven are lighted With holy, soul-born glow, To cheer poor man bonighted And charm him out of woe. And when cold wintry clouds arise, And shroud in gray the sunny skies. Then let blue eyes my glances win! I find my sky-my day therein! SERENADE.

Don't Do It! Young man! don't go in that saloon!-Why? Because it is a place where you will learn to loaf, drink whisky and gamble. Loafing is a bad business, but if you are too lazy to work, or are living on "the interest of what you owe," and make a business of loafing, for mercy's sake, and for your own sake, don't loaf in a whisky shop. If you do, you will get to drinking, if you are not at it already.
